

An Examination of Assumed Properties of Child Sexual Abuse Based on Nonclinical Samples

Paper presented to the symposium sponsored by the Paulus Kerk, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, on the 18th of December 1998

Bruce Rind, Ph.D.,

Department of Psychology Temple University,

Robert Bauserman, Ph.D.

Department of Health and Mental Hygiene, State of Maryland

& Philip Tromovitch, Ph.D. (cand.)

Graduate School of Education, University of Pennsylvania

Previous literature reviews	Link	2
Qualitative literature reviews	Link	2
Limitations of qualitative literature reviews	Link	3
Quantitative literature reviews	Link	4
National probability samples	Link	5
College samples	Link	8
Family environment	Link	14
Discussion	Link	16
Child sexual abuse as a construct reconsidered	Link	17
Nonclinical samples of boy-adult sex	Link	18
Conclusion	Link	22

In America, starting in the mid-1970s, mental health care professionals, politicians, law enforcement personnel, the media, and the lay public began paying considerable attention to child sexual abuse, which we'll often refer to in this talk as "CSA" for short.